- The course is a two-week effort that will be offered seven times per year at Ft. Huachuca. The course is strong on case studies and will incorporate guest experts, arms and explosives demonstrations, and recommended analytical techniques. The first class is scheduled to begin 26 November and is already heavily over-subscribed--the Army explained it had some 3,000 requests pending for this kind of training. Nevertheless, the Army agreed to hold out a few openings for the National Community should it choose to send observers.
- ☐ contacted NSA and CIA with that offer. The former will send one of their new analysts. CIA has decided not to send a representative. 25X1
- The lack of training is a major problem for terrorism intelligence. The only other formal analyst course is offered by the Air Force at Hurlbert Field, Florida. It is a one-week introductory course and is routinely over-subscribed. A new course at Ft. Huachuca would relieve some of the burden, but the long-term answer has to be a Washington-based course. That will be one of the recommendations of the Terrorism Working Group.
- The first inputs from the Terrorism Working Group were due 9 November. Five of the fifteen arrived on time. The remainder all proclaim their good intentions. 25X1
- There has been some controversy about who should coordinate R&D for counterterrorism, with the IG/T and IR&DC being the principal candidates. The Terrorism Working Group will be addressing this problem and will probably include a recommendation on this issue in their study.
